A: The problem is that you are missing return in a recursive algorithm. This line: if self.head == None: will always return True, because self.head == None evaluates to True, and then you do nothing but continue with the next line and the next if statement. Your function should look like this: def remove_at(self, item): """Remove the item from the linked list."""

From space, the only way to tell where a volcano is is to look at the clouds that it releases. But scientists have developed a new technology that measures thermal energy, and reveals where volcanoes are hiding on the Earth's surface. A new study led by Volcanologists at University College London (UCL) shows that static electricity is a better way to detect active volcanoes than observing the shifting clouds that erupt from their slopes. "As clouds pile up over a volcano, they gradually form peaks and mounds, just like the lava on a volcano," said Andreas Moser, a UCL professor of volcanology. "But mounds of dry ice can generate an electric charge, so by looking at the tiny voltage changes that result from this charging process, we can map the locations of volcanoes beneath the cloud layer." These remarkable images were produced using cloud photography, an innovative technique that allows researchers to study the sub-surface of the Earth by taking pictures of clouds from space. "Volcanoes are often hidden beneath the clouds they release, but this technology lets us see them for the first time. It's like photographing the surface of the Earth as clouds pass over it," said Moser. The study, published today in the journal Scientific Reports, is based on data from the NASA-NOAA Suomi National Polar-orbiting Partnership (NPP) satellite, which has been orbiting Earth since October 2006. The satellite is equipped with the best visible and infrared cameras available, and it can f678ea9f9e
